Expose by Wendelbo is a new, multifunctional furniture concept somewhere between a coffee table, a podium and an exhibition platform – in short, a new way of exhibiting home accessories. The range was designed by Jonas Wagell, from Sweden, pursuing an idea to develop a table with clean lines made of exclusive materials, on which you can display works of art and design objects, and where you can hide away the things that should not be on public display.

Coffee table books, small sculptures, handicrafts, antiques and vases are given a completely new platform with Expose. This minimalist yet extravagant range of tables that Jonas Wagell developed for Wendelbo are ideal as an exhibition platform for selected design objects or as a base for creatively arranged still lifes. The tables, constructed with several layers of different materials, also allow you to store things out of sight.

The Swedish designer began by playing with paper to come up with just the right shape, dimensions and structure. Just as paper gains strength when folded, Jonas Wagell experimented with transferring that principle to a simple shape made of thin steel, with simple folds.

A smoked glass tabletop sits on the steel structure of the table, giving a sense of transparency, while there is a marble slab as the base, adding gravitas and balance. Between the top and bottom is a steel shelf, which adds strength to the table and provides space for storing things that do not need to be on display. The shelf, which accounts for two-thirds of the dimensions of the table, extends to the back edge to reach full height on the opposite side. This creates space for books, large objects or plants.

The tables are available in three sizes that can be used separately or in a dynamic cluster. In the designer's own words, Expose is a combination of minimalist form and international extravagance. With a mix of black lacquered steel, smoked glass and marble, these tables make an elegant, graphic statement.
